Big Run State Park, southeast of Grantsville on the Savage River, lies within Savage River State Forest in Garrett County, Maryland. Within the State Park is the site of a community by the name of Bond. It was a logging town which flourished about 1900. No physical evidence of this settlement remains. Later Bond was the site of a Depression-era Civilian Conservation Corps camp. Little remains of that occupation as well except for ruins of several cabin foundations and a stone culvert. This culvert, over a run near the Savage River, is constructed of coursed stones set with raised mortar joints. A flat ledge of stone forms the coping.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Although there are few structures remaining at Big Run, the area included within the park represents a layering of land uses and settlements. The presence of Bond, a logging town, reflects the importance of the lumber industry in Garrett County during the late 19th and early 20th centuries. The CCC camp of the 1930s is typical of many such settlements in the forested areas of Western Maryland. Developing from the CCC use of the land was the system of state forest which is extensive in Allegany and Garrett Counties.

RECOMMENDATIONS

In Big Run State Park there are several ruins of cabins from a Civilian Conservation Corps camp of the 1930s. Some ruins of foundations may also date from the logging settlement known as Bond of the c. 1900 period. Although these settlements are gone, historical data could be given to explain the remains and their significance to economic and cultural development and conservation in the Western Maryland region.
